No One Cares About Crazy People is a powerful and deeply human documentary that confronts one of the most urgent yet overlooked crises of our time: the reality of living with severe mental illness in America. Director Gail Freedman delivers a film that is both intimate and expansive, weaving together personal experience, expert insight, and systemic critique to create a gripping and emotionally resonant cinematic journey.

At its core is a moving portrait of families navigating unimaginable challenges as they fight for care, dignity, and understanding. Through fearless storytelling and remarkable access, the film illuminates the lives of individuals too often ignored or misunderstood, offering a rare combination of artistic integrity, emotional depth, and social urgency.

The film was inspired by Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and New York Times bestselling author Ron Powers's acclaimed book of the same name.

Critically insightful and deeply compassionate, No One Cares About Crazy People invites viewers to reckon with stigma, confront structural failures, and reimagine what a humane mental health system could look like. Bold, timely, and unforgettable, it stands as a testament to the power of documentary film to illuminate, challenge, and inspire change.
